On the Trade of Scotland

The opening of the observations on the chart, page 101 of the edition of 1787.

The limits of this work do not admit of representing the trade of Scotland for a series of years, which, in order to understand the affairs of that country, it would be necessary to do. Yet, though they cannot be represented at full length, it would be highly blameable intirely to omit the concerns of so considerable a portion of this kingdom.

This Chart is different from the others in principle, as it does not comprehend any portion of time, and it is much inferior in utility to those that do; for though it gives the extent of the different branches of trade, it does not compare the same branch of commerce with itself at different periods; nor does it imprint upon the mind that distinct idea, in doing which, the chief advantage of Charts consists: for as it wants the dimension that is formed by duration, there is no shape given to the quantities.
